

A Career in Demolition - Pros and Cons

Cons	Pros
You will be required to contend with more red tape than the quality controller at the Acme Red Tape company
You will be expected to remember more legislation than a lawyer at the Court of Human Rights
Your fuel bill will rise faster than oil companies can extract it from the ground
Your livelihood takes second place to rats, bats, voles, shrews, mice, dormice and a variety of other swimming, slithering and scampering critters
You will be in constant danger of falling debris, abuse from local residents and being pilloried by environmentalists
Your job is seen as the occupation of the illiterate and uneducated and will, therefore, render you a second class citizen
Regardless of how scientific your approach or whether or not you use explosives, you will be forever known as "that guy that blows stuff up"
You will be underpaid, undervalued and under constant pressure
Regardless of actual circumstances, any delays in construction project WILL be your fault.
You will spend your days up to your neck in mud, either that which has gathered on the site or which has been thrown at you by clients, main contractors and other "interested" parties.	You get to wear jeans to work
